THE CHURCH, THE SYNAGOGUE AND THE FUTURE OF CANADA

Delivered by Rabbi F. M. Isserman at Carlton Street United Church Sunday evening, June 16th., at a Farewell Service arranged in his honor

(Concluded from last week)

If that point of view will prevail, Canada will become the refuge not for the unfit but for the exploited, and dispossessed, for the tyrannized and victimized. Canada could become the haven, God's haven, for the humble and the impoverished, and Canada could select for herself a spiritual destiny.

Who says that this spiritual program is impossible? Who with faith cannot but believe that a Canada inspired by teachings of synagogue and church can determine this nobler destiny. I have faith that that is possible. The very fact that I, a rabbi, have spoken thrice in this church is a hopeful sign, as is the very fact that this church and its minister felt that it must arrange a service in appreciation of a departing rabbi. The time was when a rabbi's departure from a community would have been unnoticed. Today—this service—this audience speak volumes for the new spirit—the spirit which will dominate in Canada—when bigotry, ill-will, will disappear from its national life. No more impossible than such a service would have seemed to our grandfathers, does the abolition of religious prejudice and the realization of world peace and the spiritualization of political life seem impossible to us. Where there is faith all is possible.

A Jewish commentator who rejected the belief that God called Israel to serve Him tells the story that God called the roll of nations and only Israel volunteered to become His witness. So God today is calling the roll of nations for a nation which could lead in disarmament, for a nation which would be free of religious dissensions, for a nation in whose political life the spiritual ideals of church and synagogue would prevail. Will Canada volunteer? Will Canadians be big enough to volunteer, and will the church and the synagogue help Canada choose this noble mission for herself?

And now, I must add a few personal words of appreciation—to the Christian community, among whom I have friends in all the denominations, among fundamentalists and modernists, among Catholics and Protestants. I came here a stranger, a member of a minority faith. You have listened to me. You have welcomed me. You have allowed me to work with you.

To the people of the United Church, whose great union I have witnessed, who have welcomed me as no other group has, in whose churches I have preached—to whose ministers I have lectured—to the ministers of that church, many of them so brilliant, so cultured, so liberal.

To the leaders of Carlton St. United Church, who opened for the first time in Canadian history the pulpit of a United Church to a rabbi, and thus blazed a new trail. And to you, Rev. E. Crossley Hunter, who bears the name of two noble Christian teachers, who have added new traditions to that name, whose liberal and genuinely Christian spirit has been responsible for a new rapprochement between Jew and Christian. You, sir, were a pioneer when you invited a rabbi to this pulpit. Many of my subsequent pleasant and happy relationships were due to your precedent. To you, my people and I are indebted. May God continue to bless you in your noble work! To all—the laymen who held up the hands of the minister—the common people who cheered the new vision—the journalists who hailed and applauded it, to all of you my thanks and appreciation.

And lastly, my friends, do not think of me as an exceptional Jew, as an exceptional rabbi, whom you can take to your hearts when you shut others out. These things which earned for me your affection and esteem I learned from the teachings of my father, who is in this audience tonight. He learned from his father, a rabbi in the old land. These expressions of liberalism, of goodwill, of fellowship and brotherhood which attracted you to me, are nought but the age old teachings of Judaism. You have respected me because I have been a Jew. You have liked me because I have been the articulate voice of Israel's historic ideals. When in the past you think kindly of me, as I shall of you, you will also think kindly of my coreligionists, and you will appreciate the beauty of that faith which produced an Amos and an Isaiah, a Jeremiah and a Jesus.

"I met this Rabbi while I was in Yale," said the young fellow carelessly. "He can tell you all about me."

The hotel keeper, cabled the Rabbi and learned that in every particular but one the prospective son-in-law had been correct. He had lived in New Haven, he did know the Rabbi, and the Rabbi knew all about him. The only slip-up, it appeared, was that instead of having been in Yale, the young man had been in jail.

AN INFALLIBLE TEST

Simon was now a high school sophomore and therefore was quite sophisticated.

"How can you find out," he quizzed his teacher one day, "how old a chicken is?"

"Well," asked the teacher, puzzled, "how?"

"By the teeth."

"Ah, now I've caught you," answered the teacher. "A chicken has no teeth!"

"No," agreed Simon triumphantly, "but the person who eats has!"

POLICY IS POLICY

"Is this the office of Schneider & Company?" queried a voice over the telephone.

"Yes, this is Mr. Schneider on the phone."

"This is Yankolski. I want to find out what you think of the Goldman Company."

"Sorry, but on the telephone I never say anything wrong about my patrons."

EINSTEIN HUMOR

Since Prof. Albert Einstein has attained recognition, many good stories are being told about him.

Mrs. Einstein, while walking on a street in Berlin, met an old acquaintance of hers and stopped to chat a while.

"Why," asked the friend, "have you not visited us? Your husband has become such a celebrity that we were afraid to visit you."

When Mrs. Einstein reported this conversation to her husband, he answered: "Yes, it's easy to see that decent people avoid us now."

Upon another occasion, Einstein's servant girl was suspected by the police of stealing some money and trinkets from the great scientist's house. Einstein was distressed, but was forced to testify on the witness stand.

"Who would think that this nice girl would steal things?" he said sadly.

"Not everybody is a damned fool," answered the sophisticated police officer.

Once when Einstein was riding on a street car, he thought the conductor had given him the wrong change, and called the latter's attention to it. Upon counting the change, it was found to be correct.

"He's weak in mathematics," murmured the conductor, winking at another passenger.

TRANSFERS SHOULD BE USED

A thin, timid-looking man was crushed close to a large, heavy man on a crowded street car. The thin man looked at the fat man painfully for some time and then asked the latter whether he had a transfer.

"Yes," answered the heavyweight pleasantly.

"Then please change your feet to some other place," replied the thin man bashfully, "because you have stood on mine long enough."

COUNT IT YOURSELF

A thin, severe-looking woman came into Blumberg's 5 and 10 cent store, and after searching all over the place, finally selected a toy and handed Mr. Blumberg a dime.

"Excuse me, lady, said Blumberg, "but that toy is 15 cents."

"Fifteen cents!" exclaimed the woman, incredulously.

"Fifteen cents," insisted Blumberg.

"But I thought this was a 5 and 10 cent store," protested the thin lady.

"That's right," answered Blumberg.

berg, triumphantly, "five and ten cents — now I ask you, how much does that make?"

Baron Edmund Rothschild, of Paris, known as the father of the oldest Jewish colonies in Palestine, congratulated Dr. Chaim Weizmann, President of the World Zionist Organization, on the success of his negotiations for the extension of the Jewish Agency.

Commandants Weiss and Girard, two seasoned French army pilots, broke the world's speed record for a distance of 5,000 kilometres (about 3,125 miles) after twenty-six hours of continuous flying at an average speed of 180 kilometres (about 111.75 miles) an hour.

The Rise of David Levinsky

A Novel by Abraham Cahan

By arrangement with HARPER and BROTHERS, Copyright.

But alas! My happiness was not to last long.

I was giving Nodelman his fifth lesson. We were spelling out some syllables in a First Reader. Presently he grew absent-minded and then, suddenly pushing the school-book from him, said:

"Too late! Too late! Those black little dots won't get through my forehead. It has grown too hard for them. I suppose."

I attempted to reassure him, but in vain.

When the next chuk season came I slunk back to work. I felt degraded. But I earned high wages and my good spirits soon returned. I firmly made up my mind, come what might, to take the college-entrance examination the very next fall. I expected to have four hundred dollars by then, but I was determined to enter college even if I had much less. "I shan't starve," I said to myself. "And, if I don't get enough to eat, hunger is nothing new to me."

The very firmness of my purpose was a source of encouragement and joy.

BOOK VIII

THE DESTRUCTION OF MY TEMPLE

CHAPTER I

An unimportant accident, a mere trifle, suddenly gave a new turn to the trend of events changing the character of my whole life.

It was the middle of April. The spring season was over, but Manheimer Brothers, the firm by which I was employed, had received heavy duplicate orders for silk coats, and, considering the time of the year, we were unusually busy. One day, at the lunch hour, as I was opening a small bottle of milk, the bottle slipped out of my hand and its contents were spilled over the floor and some silk coats.

Jeff Manheimer, one of the twins, happened to be near me at the moment, and a disagreeable scene followed. But first a word or two about Jeff Manheimer.

He was the "inside man" of the firm, having charge of the mechanical end of the business as well as of the offices. He was of German parentage, but of American birth. Bald-headed as a melon and with a tendency to corpulence, he had the back of a man of forty-five and the front of a man of twenty-five. He was a vivacious fellow, one of those who are indefatigable in abortive attempts at being witty, one of his favorite puns being that we "Russians were not rushin' at all," that we were a "slow lot." Altogether he treated us as an inferior race, often lecturing up upon our lack of manners. I detested him.

When he saw me drop the bottle of milk he flew into a rage.

"Eh!" he shouted, "did you think this was a kitchen? Can't you take better care of things?" As he saw me crouching and wiping the floor and the coats with my handkerchief he added: "You might as well take those coats home. The price will be charged against you. That'll make you remember that this is not a barn, but a factory. Where were you brought up? Among Indians?"

Some of my shopmates tittered obsequiously, which encouraged Manheimer to further sarcasm.

"Why, he doesn't even know how to handle a bottle of milk. Did you ever see such a lobster?"

At this there was an explosion of merriment.

"A lobster!" one of the tailors repeated, relishingly.

I could have murdered him as well as Manheimer.

My head was swimming. I was about to say something insulting to my employer, to get up and leave the place demonstratively. But I said to myself that I should soon be through with this kind of life for good, and I held myself in leash.

Two or three minutes later I sat at a machine, eating my milkless lunch. I was trying to forget the incident, trying to think of something else, but in vain. Manheimer's derision, especially the word "lobster," was ringing in my ear.

He passed out of the shop, but ten or fifteen minutes later he came back, and as I saw him walk down the aisle I became breathless with hate. The word "lobster" was buzzing in my brain amid vague, helpless visions of revenge.

Presently my eye fell upon Ansel Chaikin, the designer, and a strange thought flashed upon me.

He was a Russian, like myself. He was an ignorant tailor, as illiterate as Meyer Nodelman, but a born artist in his line. It was largely to his skill that the firm, which was doing exceedingly well, owed the beginning of its success. It was the common talk among the "hands" of the factory that his Americanized copies of French models had found special favor with the buyer of a certain large department store and that this alone gave the house a considerable volume of business. Jeff Manheimer, who superintended the work, was a commonplace man, with more method and system than taste or initiative. Chaikin was the heart and the actual master of the establishment. Yet all this really wonderful designer received was forty-five dollars a week. He knew his value, and he saw that the two brothers were rapidly getting rich, but he was a quiet man, unaggressive and unassuming, and very likely he had not the courage to ask for a raise.

As I now looked at him, with my heart full of rancor for Manheimer, I exclaimed to myself, "What a fool!"

He appeared to me in a new light, as the willing victim of downright robbery. It seemed obvious that the Manheimers could not do without him, that he was in a position to dictate terms to them, even to make them accept him as a third partner. And once the matter had presented itself to me in that light it somehow began to vex me. I got on my nerves, as though it were an affair of my own. I complimented myself upon my born sense of justice, but in reality this was my name for my disgust was Chaikin's poverty and for the annoyance and the burning will which the rapid ascent of the firm aroused in me. I begrudged them.

JULY 5TH.

Papal Bull against the Blood Accusation, 1247. The foul libel endemic in Europe since the case of William of Norwich (March 22nd., 1144) was claiming an increasing number of victims. At last the congregations of France and Germany appealed for protection to Pope Innocent IV. Though by no means well-disposed towards the Jews as a general rule, he issued a Bull in which the charge was condemned without qualification as baseless and ridiculous. This was the first of a long series of such declarations which emanated from the Throne of St. Peter at intervals down to the present day. Though powerless to check the scourge, they give the Papacy a lasting claim upon the gratitude of the Jew, which later reaction should not nullify.

JULY 6TH.

Massacre at Tarrega (Catalonia), 1348. The libel of poisoning the wells and thus introducing the infection of the Black Death had spread from Savoy southwards as well as northwards, until it reached Spain. Though the consequences here were not by any means as serious as they had been in Germany, a wave of massacres ran through Catalonia. The disorders began at Barcelona, one Sabbath day, towards evening. The next community to suffer was that of Cervera. Three days later, on the Fast of Ab, the turn of Tarrega followed. Its lot was the most terrible of all. More than three hundred persons were killed. The survivors remained hidden until the danger was past, when they returned to find their homes sacked.

JULY 7TH.

Secular education imposed on Galician Rabbis, 1836. This was a development of the policy of Joseph II for improving the status of the Jews of the Austrian dominions. It was decreed that after a period of ten years had elapsed no rabbi should be appointed who had not taken an academic course at some recognised university. The inborn prejudices of the Galician Jews, steeped in their traditional life, proved however too much for the government to overcome and the law became in consequence a dead letter.

JULY 8TH.

Massacre of refugees from Cologne, 1096. The Archbishop Hermann had sheltered the Jews from the attack of May 29th., sending them subsequently for safety to the smaller places in his diocese. For some weeks they remained unmolested. At last their hiding-places were discovered, and they shared the fate of their brethren. Many fled to the woods and marshes, where they sought death. One person in particular, Samuel ben Jehiel by name, slaughtered his son as he stood in the stream, then pronouncing a ritual blessing. Then he and his companions threw themselves into the water and died with the Shema on their lips. "The names of these also are commemorated on the Sabbath before Pentecost," literally records the ancient martyrology.

JULY 9TH.

Nathaniel Meyer, first Baron Rothschild, takes his seat in the House of Lords, 1885. His father, Baron Lionel, had been the first professing Jew to be elected to the House of Commons (1847) and eleven years later was the first to avail himself of the amended form of oath and to take his seat regularly (July 26th., 1858). In 1866, the Parliamentary Oaths Act introduced a new formula not containing the words "upon true faith of a Christian," thus enabling Jews to be sworn as members of the House of Lords as well. Nothing came of this for twenty years. At last Baron Lionel's son, after sitting in the lower House from 1865 to 1885, was raised to the peerage. Jewish emancipation in England reached its climax when, on July 9th., 1885, he took his seat.

JULY 10TH.

Death of Joseph Treves, 1429. His family, which hailed from the town of Trier, played an important part in Jewish life. One of his brothers was Johanan ben Matthias Treves, Chief Rabbi of France from 1385 to 1394, who engaged in a notable controversy with a certain Isaac ben Abba Mari, who disputed his office on the strength of ordination by the famous Meir ben Barukh of Vienna. The dispute was still raging at the time of the final expulsion of 1394, when both brothers left France and settled in Italy. Joseph Treves was the author of several liturgical poems, including a Tokhaha in the form of a dialogue between the living and the dead. He died on the Ninth of Ab, 5289. Descendants of this Italian branch founded in the eighteenth century the Treves family in England, now lost to Judaism.

JULY 11TH.

Expulsion from Little Russia, 1739. As yet, the number of Jews in the country was not considerable, and Peter the Great had been apathetic towards them, even though not altogether benevolent. It was, characteristically, the Empresses of the eighteenth century who began the tradition of persecution. Catherine the Great, on April 26th-May 7th., 1727, had issued an edict expelling the Jews from her dominions; but the Ukrainians petitioned against it through their hetman, and after her death the regulations were relaxed. The Empress Anna, however, revived her traditions, and on July 11th-22nd., 1739, ordered the expulsion of the Jews from the whole of Little Russia. The whole episode throws a curious light upon their numerical unimportance at so late a date in a region in which they had formed so great a proportion of the population.

Every Friday

Last week this column gave you the gist of an article on "How Help Russian Jewry?" which appeared in the Menorah Journal series on the problem of European relief. This week information will be given on "How Help Lithuanian Jewry?" in parts verbatim from the article by Zachariah Shuster in the June issue.

Lithuanian Jews since the war have been struggling against ruin and starvation under the eyes of a Government cold to their plight. But some weeks ago this plight became an emergency and lives were at stake because people were actually going hungry, having at last arrived in the midst of famine. The direct cause of this disaster is the failure of the 1928 crop in Lithuania. Last spring rainfall swelled rivers, flooded fields and made planting impossible. The same thing happened in autumn followed by the extreme cold wave that swept Europe. Nearly half the Jewish population of Lithuania, 65,000, live in the ten districts affected by the calamity. Ruin fell on the peasant and then on the Jewish middleman. The peasant could not pay his debts and the merchant was left in debt to the wholesaler. The Jew is the tradesman and trade was paralyzed, leaving the Jewish merchant bankrupt. Thousands of artisans, unable to collect for past work, are starving to death. Government assistance is all for the peasants in the ruined districts but the Jews will get no help. The Director of Taxes in the Finance Department of the Lithuanian Government told a representative of the Yiddische Stimme, the only Yiddish daily, that merchants would not be granted a moratorium on taxes. And taxes may even be increased. Credit is extended to the peasants but not to the Jewish Folk Banks or to Jewish artisans.

The Jew in Lithuania always lived in a poor, agricultural country worked by peasants ignorant of how to develop the land to the full. Agriculture was closed to the Jew and he became a merchant, middleman, peddler or artisan, always poor, with few exceptions. When the War scattered tens of thousands of Jewish families through Russia and made them refugees over night. Scarcely half of these returned home. The Government was heartless toward them and their only help came from the American Joint Distribution Committee and the Jewish Colonization Association which established as a temporary measure a series of Folks Banks. The Government is indifferent for economic reasons aside from Anti-Semitism. The regime is a government for the peasants. The Jews are chiefly importers while the Government wants to build up an export trade. The peasant is given help while the manufacturer and merchant carry almost the entire burden of the budget. The petty merchant comprises 30 percent of the Jewish population and it is his condition which demands immediate attention. It has been made impossible by competition from new, Christian co-operatives aided by the State. The artisan is unable to cope with machine production and thousands are out of work. If possible they will sink still lower because the business treaty between Germany and Lithuania will permit the modern German worker to settle in Lithuania. Living conditions beggar description. The average income for years has been $15 or $20 a month for an entire family. In Kovno six to eight people live in one room.

Three remedies must be tried by the American brethren of the Jews in Lithuania: To re-stratify Jews occupationally to fit better the economic needs of the country; to end economic Anti-Semitism; to establish credits for merchants and artisans. If the Jewish Folks Banks were properly financed they could rehabilitate the Jews. At present the Folks Banks are forced to charge as high as 21 percent on loans for three months and under and 15 percent on six months at the most because they themselves have to pay such high interest. The maximum long term loan is $50; short term, $150 to $200. Such short term loans are worthless because the Jewish merchants have to extend credit for longer than that to the peasant customers. If the Folks Banks were provided with one half million dollars capital they could extend loan periods and cut down the interest rate. This is the fundamental reform needed for the economic reconstruction of Lithuanian Jewry. Without it nothing can be done in a permanent way. Also, as in Russia, constructive labors should include settling families on the land and providing tools, machinery and industrial schools for the teaching of modern methods. In this regard the work of the Ort is limited by lack of funds.

Also the Lithuanian Government must be appealed to by Jews on this side to change its economic policy toward the merchant. Otherwise aid extended to the Jewish merchant can be undone by pressure from the Government. The Jews there can not do anything for themselves in this regard. They are disorganized politically as well as economically. A decade ago they had a national organization, kehilloth and a liaison with the State through a Minister for Jewish affairs. All that has been scrapped and a Committee of Jewish social workers, for emergency relief is the only Jewish body. The present regime looks with relish upon the inevitable pauperization of the entire Jewish population which is helping. The relief plans of the Federation of American Jews of Lithuanian Descent include long term credits and farm workers' schools, and a permanent Jewish organization. But it must have help from the J. D. C.

As the Menorah Journal performs the valuable service for American and European Jewry of contributing to the general knowledge of the issues involved in the relief task, this column will condense the information for you.

Jeff—the money they were through his efficiency. "He idiot!" I soliloquized. "He start on his own hook with smart business man for a part. Jeff try to do without that of a Russian." Idea took a peculiar hold imagination, I could not look at Chaikin, or think of him, picturing him leaving the Man in a lurch and becoming a fatal for of theirs. I beheld their I gloated over it. Chaikin lacked gumption and. What he needed was an actor, some man of brains and and so, unbeknown to Chaikin, tion was shaping itself in my of becoming his manufacturing thought of Meyer Nudelmann's beginnings and of the three hundred dollars I had in my savings bank, whispered encouragement by ear. I had heard of people who into manufacturing with even less than sum. Moreover, it was reasonable to expect that Chaikin had had some money of his own. Our previous life among unfriendly relations made a doubly gangle of us, and for a man like Chaikin forty-five dollars a week, every week in the year, meant superabundance.

The Hamshiners were relegated to the background. It was no longer a mere matter of punishing Jeff. It was a much greater thing.

I visioned myself a rich man, of course, but that was merely a detail. What really hypnotized me was the venture of the thing. It was a great, daring game of life.

I tried to reconcile this new dream of mine with my college projects. I was again performing the trick of eating the cake and having it. I would picture myself building up a great cloak business and somehow contriving, at the same time, to go to college.

The new scheme was scarcely ever absent from my mind. I would ponder it over my work and during my meals. It would visit me in my sleep in a thousand grotesque forms. Chaikin became the center of the universe. I was continually eyeing him, listening for his voice, scrutinizing his look, his gestures, his clothes.

He was an insignificant-looking man of thirty-two, with almost a cadaverous face and a very prominent Adam's apple. He was not a prepossessing man by any means, but his black eyes had a charming look, of top-like dressmaker, and his smile was even more child-like than his look. He was dressed with scrupulous neatness and rather pretentiously, as beveled his occupation, but all this would scarcely have prevented one from telling him for a tailor from some poor town in Russia.

Now and then by project struck me as absurd. For Chaikin was in the lowest ranks of a trade in which I was one of the rank. Should he conceive the notion of going into business on his own account, he would have no difficulty in forming a partnership with considerable capital. Why, then, should he take heed of a pitious scheme of my caliber? But a few minutes later I would see the matter in another light.

SINCE fire was discovered experiment has followed experiment as men sought for home comfort. There have been many attempts to reach a perfection of heating of the home. But only gas satisfies every requirement. It is the only fuel that can be burned and its heating value realized without the aid of many furnace accessories. All other fuels must be made into gas before they burn, and they must leave residues in the form of ash or other kinds of dirt.

GAS house heating is long past the stage of experiment. Gas-burning furnaces have been brought to a state of perfection and efficiency that far exceeds even the possibilities of other fuels. One of the greatest benefits of gas as a furnace fuel is its easy regulation. In solid fuel furnaces heat is controlled by opening and closing drafts. It can be readily understood that here is a method where much of the fuel goes to waste. The gas furnace is automatic.

Children often act as a barometer of their mother's moods. So when I had finished, and little Maxie slipped up close to me and tactfully invited me to fondle him I knew that I had made a favorable impression on his mother.

I was detained for dinner. I played with Maxie, gave him problems in arithmetic, went into ecstasies over his "cuteness." I had a feeling that the way to Mrs. Chaikin's heart was through Maxie, but I took good care not to overplay my part.

We are all actors, more or less. The question is only what our aim is, and whether we are capable of a "convincing personation." At the time I conceived my financial scheme I knew enough of human motive to be aware of this.

CHAPTER III

It was a sultry, sweltering July afternoon in May, one of those escapades of the New York climate when the population finds itself in the grip of mid-summer discomforts without having had time to get seasoned to them. I went into the Park. I had come away from the Chaikins' under the impression that if I could raise two or three thousand dollars I might be able, by means of perseverance and diplomacy, to achieve my purpose. But I might as well have set myself to raise two or three millions.

I thought of Meyer Nodelman, of Mr. Kern and his wealthy son-in-law, of Maximum Max. But the idea of approaching them with my venture could not be taken seriously. The images of Gittel and of Gussie crossed my mind almost simultaneously. I rejected them both Gittel and I might, perhaps, start manufacturing on a small scale, leaving Chaikin out. But Chaikin was the very soul of my project. Without him there was no life to it. He sides, where was he, Gittel? Was it worth while hunting for him?

As for Gussie, the notion of marrying her for her money seemed a joke, even if she were bent on looking and younger. That Lee Dow was anywhere near three thousand dollars was exceedingly doubtful. However, the fact of her washed out face would not leave my mind. Her boarding might amount to over one thousand and in my despair the sum was tempting. "She is a good girl, the best of all I know," I defended myself before the "Good Spirit" in me. "Also she is a most sensible girl just the kind of wife a business man needs." In addition I urged the time honored theory that a homely wife is less likely to flirt with other men and to neglect her duties than a good-looking one.

I took the car down-town and made my way to Gussie's lodgings that very afternoon. I did so before I had made up my mind that I was prepared to marry her. "I'll call on her, anyhow," I decided. "Then we shall see. There can be no harm in speaking to her."

I was impelled by the adventure of it more than by anything else.

In spite of the unbearable heat, I almost felt sure that I should find her at home. Going out of a Sunday required presentable clothes, which she did not possess. She was saving for her dower with her usual intensity.

I was not mistaken. I found her on the stoop in a crowd of women and children.

"I must speak to you, Gussie," I said, as she descended to the sidewalk to meet me. "Let's go somewhere. I have something very important I want to say to you."

"Is it again something about your studying to be a smart man at my expense?" she asked, rather good-naturedly.

"No, no. Not at all. It's something altogether different, Gussie."

The nervous emphasis with which I said it piqued her interest. Without going up-stairs for her hat she took me to the Grand Street dock, not many blocks away. The best spots were already engaged, but we found one that suited our purpose better than the water edge would have done. It was a secluded nook where I could give the rein to my eloquence.

I told her of my talk with the Chaikins, omitting names, but inventing details and bits of "local color" calculated to appeal to my listener's imagination and business sense. She followed my story with an air of stiff aloofness, but this only added fuel to the fervor with which I depicted the opportunity before me.

"So you have thrown that college of yours out of your mind, haven't you?" she said in a dry-non-committal way.

I felt the color mounting to my face. "Well, not entirely," I answered. "Not entirely?"

"I mean—Well, say how, what do they do at college? They read books. Can't I read them at home? One can find time for everything." Returning to my new project, I said: "It's a great chance, Gussie. It would be an awful thing if I had to let it slip out of my hand."

That what I wanted was her dower (with herself as an unavoidable appendix) went without saying. It was implied, as a matter of course.

"How much would your great designer want you to invest?" she asked, with an air of one guided by mere curiosity, and with a touch of irony to boot.

"A couple of thousand dollars might do, I suppose."

"A couple of thousand?" she said, lukewarmly. "Tell your great designer he is riding too high a horse."

"Still, in order to start decent business—" I said, throwing a covert glance at her.

"Cloak factories have been started with a good deal less," she suggested back.

"On Division Street, perhaps. And what do you fellows want to do start on Broadway?"

"Well, it takes some money to get started even on Division Street."

"Not two thousand. It has been done for a good deal less."

"I know; but still—I am a fellow must have some money."

"It depends on what you call 'some.'"

It was the same kind of fencing contest as that which I had had with Mrs. Chaikin. I was sounding Gussie up as the designer's wife had

NORTHERN ONTARIO CANADA

Northern Ontario, now open for settlement at fifty cents per acre, contains millions of acres of the finest agricultural land in the world. Its resources in lumber, minerals, water, power, fish, game and scenery are immense. The land calls for men to cultivate it, and in return will give health, comfort and prosperity.

What settlers say of the soil, climate, farming, and forest life, is told in a most attractive booklet issued under the direction of the Honourable John S. Martin, Minister of Agriculture for Ontario. Full instructions in regards to acquiring a title to these rich agricultural lands are also given.

The transition was inevitable. While the manufacturers were German Jews, their contractors, tailors, and machine operators were Yiddish-speaking immigrants from Russia or Austria-Galicia. Although the former were of a superior commercial civilization, it was, after all, a case of Greek meeting Greek, and the circumstances were such that just because they represented a superior commercial civilization they were doomed to be beaten.

The German manufacturers were the pioneers of the industry in America. It was a new industry, in fact, scarcely twenty years old. Formerly and as late as the '70's, women's cloaks and jackets were little known in the United States. Shawls were worn by the masses. What few cloaks were seen on women of means and fashion were imported from Germany. But the demand grew. So, gradually, some German-American merchants and an American shawl firm betthought themselves of manufacturing these garments at home. The industry progressed, the new born great Russian immigration—a child of the massacres of 1881 and 1882—bringing the needed army of tailors for it. There was big money in the cloak business, and it would have been unnatural if some of these tailors had not, sooner or later, begun to think of going into business on their own hook. At first it was a hard struggle. The American business world was slow to appreciate the commercial possibilities which these new-comers represented, but it learned them in course of time.

It was at the beginning of this transition period that my scheme was born in my mind. Schemes of that kind were in the air.

Meyer Nadelman, the son of my landlord, had not the remotest inkling of my plans, yet I had consulted him about them more than once. Of course, it was all done in a purely abstract way. Like the majority of our people, he was a talkative man, so I would try to keep him talking shop. By a system of seemingly casual questioning I would pump him on sundry details of the clothing business, on the differences and similarities between it and the cloak trade, and, more especially, on how one started on a very small capital.

He bragged and blustered, but oftentimes he would be carried away by the sentimental side of his past struggles. Then he would unburden himself of a great deal of unvarnished history. On such occasions I would obtain from him a veritable treasure of information and suggestions.

Some of the generalizations of this homespun and quaint thinker, too, were interesting. Talking of credit, for example, he once said:

"When a fellow is a beginner it's a good thing if he has a credit face."

I thought it was some sort of commercial term he was using, and when I asked him what it meant he said:

"Why, some people are just born with the kind of face that makes the warden merchant or the bank president trust them. They are not more honest than some other fellows. Indeed, some of them are plain pickpockets, but they have a credit face, so you have got to trust them. You just can't help it."

"And if they don't pay?"

"But they do. They get credit from somebody else and pay the jobber or the banker. Then they get more credit from these people and pay the other fellows. People of this kind can do a big business without a cent of capital. In Russia a fellow who pays his bills is called an honest man, but America is miles ahead of Russia. Here you can be the best pay in the world and yet be a crook. You wouldn't say that every man who breathes God's air is honest, would you? Well, paying your bills in America is like breathing. If you don't, you are dead."

Chaikin, too, often let fall, in his hesitating, incoherent way, some observation which I considered of value. Of the purely commercial side of the industry he knew next to nothing, but then he could tell me a thing or two concerning the psychology of popular taste, the forces operating behind the scenes of fashion, the methods employed by small firms in strutting styles from large ones, and other tricks of the trade.

At last I resolved to act. It was the height of the season for winter orders, and I decided to take time by the forelock.

One day when I called at the designer's, and Mrs. Chaikin asked me for news (alluding to the thousands I was supposed to be expecting), I said:

"Well, I have rented a shop."

"Rented a shop?"

"That's what I did. It's no use missing the season. If a fellow wants to do something, there is nothing for it but to go to work and do it, else he is doomed to be a slave all his life."

When I added that the shop was on Division Street her face fell.

"But what difference does it make where it is?" I argued, with studied vehemence. "It's only a place to make samples in for a start."

"Mr. Chaikin is not going into a wee bit of a business like that. No, sir."

In the course of our many discussions it had often happened that after overruling me with great finality she would end by yielding to my point of view. I hoped this would be the case in the present instance.

"Don't be so hasty, Mrs. Chaikin," I said, with a smile. "Wait till you know a little more about the arrangement."

And dropping into the Talmudic singsong, which usually comes back to me when my words assume an argumentative character, I proceeded:

"In the first place, I don't want Mr. Chaikin to leave the Manheimers—not yet. All I want him to do is to attend to our shop evenings. Don't be uneasy; the Manheimers won't get wind of it. Leave that to me. Well, all I want is some samples to go around the stores with. The rest will come easy. We'll make things hum. See if we don't. When we have orders and get really started we'll move out of Division Street. Of course we will. But would it not be foolish to open up on a large scale and have Mr. Chaikin give up his job before we have accomplished anything? I think it would. Indeed, it's my money that's going to be invested. Do you blame me for being careful, at the beginning at least? I neither want Mr. Chaikin to risk his job nor myself to risk big money."

"But you haven't even told me how much you can put in," she blazed out, excitedly.

"As much as will be necessary. But what's the use dumping a big lot at once? Many a big business has failed, while firms who start in a modest way have worked themselves up. Why should Mr. Chaikin begin by risking his position? Why? Why?"

The long and short of it was that Mrs. Chaikin became enthusiastic for my Division Street shop, and the next day her husband took two hours off to accompany me to a nondescript wooden store on Hester Street, where we bought fifty dollars' worth of material.

The rent for the shop was thirty dollars a month. One month's rent for two sewing-machines was two dollars. A large second-hand table for designing and cutting and some old chairs cost me twelve dollars more, leaving me a balance of over two hundred dollars.

Before I went to rent the premises for our prospective shop I had withdrawn my money from the savings-bank and deposited it in a small bank where I opened a check account.

"Once I am to play the part of a manufacturer it would not do to pay bills in cash," I reflected. "I must pay in checks, and do so like one to the manner born."

At this the magic word "credit" loomed in letters of gold before me. I was aware of the fascination of check-books, so, being armed with one, I expected to be able to buy things. In some cases, at least, without having to pay for them at once. Besides, my bank might be induced to grant me a loan. Then, too, one might issue a check before one had the amount and thereby gain a day's time. There seemed to be a world of possibilities in the long, narrow book in my breast pocket. I was ever conscious of its presence. I have a vivid recollection of the elation with which I drew and issued my first check (in payment of thirty dollars, the first month's rent for our prospective cloak-factory). Humanity seemed to have become divided into two distinct classes—those who paid their obligations in cash and those who paid them in checks. I still have that first check-book of mine.

CHAPTER V

Chaikin made up half a dozen sample garments. I took them to the department store in which the Manheimer Brothers catered, but the buyer of the cloak department would not so much as let me untie my bundle. He was a middle-aged man (women buyers were rare in those days), an Irish-American of commanding figure. After sweeping me with a glance of cold curiosity, he waved me aside. My Russian name and my appearance were evidently against me. I tried the other department stores with the same result. The larger business world of the city had not yet learned to take the Russian Jew seriously as a factor in advanced commerce. The buyer of the cloak department in the last store I visited was an American Jew, a fair-complexioned little fellow, all aglitter with neatness. At first he took an amused interest in me. When I had unpacked my goods and was about to show him one of Chaikin's jackets he checked me.

"Suppose we gave you an order for five hundred," he said with a smile; "five hundred jackets to be delivered at a certain date."

"I would deliver it," I answered, boldly. "Why not?"

"I don't know why. Maybe you would, maybe you wouldn't. But can we be sure you would?"

Before I had time to answer he asked me how long I had been in the country. When I told him, he complimented me on my English. I was sure it meant business, I was thrilled.

"Have you got a shop?" he further questioned. "How many hands do you employ?"

"Seventy-five."

He sized me up. "Where is your place?"

"In Division Street."

"Well, well! What is your range?" I did not know what he meant, so, for an answer, I made a new attempt to submit the contents of my bundle for his inspection. At this he made a gesture of disgust and withdrew. A cold sweat broke out on my forehead.

I had heard of the existence of small department stores in various sections of the city, so I went in search of them.

I found myself in the vicinity of the City College. As I passed that corner I studiously looked down. I felt like a convert Jew passing a synagogue.
